PREFACE

For more than a decade land speculators have attempted to acquire possession of the valuable and apparently abandoned old Methodist Burying Ground area. Although there had been for many years some concern by residents, sociologists and historians to preserve the old grounds, positive action to do so was not taken until the 1960's, when the threat of building highrise apartments or townhouses was imminent. It became apparent that decisive and swift action was necessary in order to save the historic area from doom. At stake was the loss of the evidence of the ambition and personal concern for the old grounds by its early black proprietors, a concern which weighed historically on the mental and emotional attitude of the Georgetown Negro during the opening years of the 20th century. This aboveground study is specifically intended to add emphasis and meaning to the current efforts being made to protect, preserve and memorialize this area.

The first and most important source of information used in this study was obtained from the existing grave-markers within the old Methodist Grounds. To facilitate the transcribing process, the area was first cleared of undergrowth, vines and trees, and then carefully and accurately staked off into 20 foot squares. (Appendix B) Volunteer students from Western High School, after some instruction in the process, methodically moved from grid to grid, transcribing and marking each monument and recording the information on a previously prepared form. By joining the individually completed forms, it was possible to obtain an accurate layout of the grounds, noting the concentration of burials within a given area. (Appendix C)

A second source of burial information was the few records still available of burials in the old cemetery. The earliest reference to burials within the area was found in the District of Columbia's Bureau of Vital Statistics, where the 1855-1874 record of deaths was searched. Within the old records of the Mt. Zion Methodist Church were found two books which had entries relating to the Methodist Ground burials for the years 1913 to 1940 and 1936 to 1942. Lastly, a foldover-type inquiry was distributed to the members of the Mt. Zion Church congregation, as well as to several other churches involved in burials within the grounds. The church members were asked to contribute any information they might have concerning the deceased they know to be interred there. On the back of the questionnaire was an outline map of the grounds where a survivor or friend might try to pinpoint the burial location. From the combined information obtained from the grid maps and questionnaires, it was possible to complete a wall map of the grounds depicting the location of known burials. In addition, inquiries were made at many local funeral homes, and records, books and other literature at such District locations as the National Archives, local libraries and various churches were checked for information that might be important.

Special acknowledgment is given to the Mt. Zion Cemetery Committee, which handled many arduous tasks with dedication and efficiency. The committee dealt, among other things, with the demanding task of distributing and processing the numerous questionnaires. Using information received on them and that obtained after many hours on the telephone, the committee members completed handwritten cards for the interments and placed them in a file. This procedure resulted in an alphabetized file containing the records of hundreds of old Methodist Ground burials. The members of the Mt. Zion Cemetery Committee are:

INTRODUCTION

When the boundaries of the District of Columbia were agreed upon on July 16, 1790, the newly designated Capital City was a rural countryside dotted with many graveyards scattered over the area. These were generally the final resting places of the original proprietors and were located in the vicinity of their homes.¹ Included in the original Federal city annexation, but separated by topography, were two quaint southern towns. One of these, Alexandria, was later receeded to Virginia; the second was known as "Georgetown Heights," by early residents and was considered by them as a city within itself, distinct from its "Washington City" counterpart.

Shortened to "Georgetown," the quiet community was located to the west of the Washington city limits and was accessible from there only by traveling several miles of open and rutted roads which had been carved from the slaveholding countrysides. Georgetown was a typical southern town, with free, indentured and enslaved Negroes forming a large portion of the population. Within the newly designed boarders of the young city, the institution of slavery had been an inescapable reality. In 1800, when the District of Columbia became the official seat of the government of the United States, about 3,244 of the District's 14,093 inhabitants were slaves.²

The life of the freedman was distinctly directed and governed by ordinances written specifically to maintain the status quo of the slave-owner relationship. Both slave and freedmen were subject to the subtleties and dictates of the white family influence. From birth to death the slave's life, in particular, was predetermined. As a lifelong slave or working free black of a white family, he was usually buried within, or very close to, the white family's burial plot.³ Several examples of slave burials include the claim that the slaves of Robert Peter, who once owned numerous lots in the downtown area, were buried on "Twenty-fourth Street, between H and I Streets, north; "⁴ the resting places of the slaves of the Pierce and Shoemaker families are said to have been buried near the white family plots, both in the vicinity of the old Pierce Mill in Northwest Washington.⁵

Not having been free in life, the slave realized that the stigma of his shackles persisted even to his place of burial and that even death failed to be the Great Equalizer. Thorn dividers in public cemeteries were bitter reminders to remaining loved ones of that fact. Ultimately, a few slaves and former slaves, through their church affiliation, took a bold step toward independence which culminated in the establishment of a separate congregation and a nearly exclusive burial ground in Georgetown.

Researchers have found that in the early 1800's the Districts burial sites contained the remains of both white and black families, and there was hardly a farm in any area which did not have its private family cemetery. As the Washington population grew and the urban area increased accordingly, the rural land decreased, and the concentration of population boosted the need for available in-town property. Thus, the grouping of burials within and close to the city itself, resulted in the establishment of cemeteries of considerable size. One such cemetery was Holmead's or the "Western Burial Ground," which had been set aside on February 28, 1798, as a public burial area. Within Holmeads was a section quartered off by a thorn fence for "people of color" and slaves.⁶ Holmead's Cemetery became abandoned and was relocated to Rock Creek and Graceland Cemeteries in 1884. Rock Creek Cemetery, located outside of the city limits to the north, dates as a place of burials from about 1719 and is considered by some authorities as the oldest cemetery in the District of Columbia. First a Catholic and later a non-denominational burial ground, its policy did not forbid the burial of Negroes there, but the history of the cemetery indicates that few such burials were made during its continuing existence; Graceland Cemetery remained a popular biracial public burying ground for many years but was eventually relocated because of its marshy land and the population growth around it.

Considering the racial situation at the time, it becomes somewhat easy to grasp the reason many blacks were either buried in a segregated area or, in many instances, in any convenient and uninhabited location. There is record of Negroes having been buried along the banks of Tiber Creek, a now long extinct tributary of the Anacostia River.⁷ Many Negroes and a few whites were classified as paupers and were frequently interred in one of the several "Potter's Fields" which existed for indigents within the District almost from its beginnings and continuing well into the 20th century. One such early field was located at 6th and M Streets, Northwest; the best remembered, though, was located behind the District Jail, just north of Congressional Cemetery (which dates from about 1807) in Southeast Washington.

Until 1879, when the newly established Mt. Zion Methodist Church congregation took over the responsibility and operation of the old Methodist Grounds in Georgetown, there existed no cemetery which had been intended for the burial of Washington's black population, either slave or free. After that time, however, and especially after the Civil War, there were several efforts made to found and maintain other burials grounds for that purpose. Nevertheless, of the considerable number established, most have been relocated or have simply been destroyed by the progress of urbanization. Today there are only four (4) predominantly black cemeteries remaining within the District boundaries. They are the Union Cemetery at Chain Bridge Road and McArthur Boulevard, Northwest; the Female Union Band Society Ground, adjacent to the old Methodist Ground; and the Woodlawn Cemetery, located at 4611 Benning Road, Northeast. The Union Cemetery and the Female Union Band Society Ground were established in the mid-1800's, and Woodlawn Cemetery established in 1895, replaced Graceland Cemetery.

The old Methodist Ground remains as the forerunner, having been a biracial burying area during the opening years of the Capital City and continuing to 1879 as an almost exclusively black burying ground. Its important role in cemetery development is impressive enough to make the old burying area a worthwhile aboveground study, but underlying this distinction is the interesting history of the old Methodist Ground as it relates to the early Georgetown inhabitants, black and white.

HISTORY

Since about 1879, many District residents have incorrectly assumed that Mt. Zion Cemetery is composed of one burial ground. Actually, the area consists of two separate but adjacent cemeteries - the old Methodist Burying Ground, with which this study is concerned, and the Female Union Band Society Burying Ground, dating from about 1842, which will be discussed in a subsequent study. Overlooking Rock Creek Park, the cemeteries lie just east of the well-known Oak Hill Cemetery and consist almost equally of about 1 1/2 acres. (See Appendix A) The early history of Georgetown's black population lies in the graves of those interred in the old Methodist Burying Ground of Mt. Zion Cemetery, and it is to this end that this historical study is directed.

The old Methodist Burying Ground was established on property owned by the Montgomery Street Church (known as the Dumbarton Methodist Church after 1850). The property was purchased on October 13, 1808, by Ebenezer Eliason on behalf of the trustees of the church at a cost of $500. The deed provided that the land was to be used as a burying ground and subdivided into "lots, lanes, or alleys of such dimensions as they (the trustees) or the majority of them, in their judgement and discretion, shall think best and most convenient for the aforesaid purpose."⁸

It might safely be reasoned that the ground was used for burials by the church even before the formal deed was signed. The grounds were used for the burial of church members and their slaves and, though there remains no indication that burials were segregated in any way, because of the pressures of class distinction, some such separation of those burials may have been made.

At the beginning of the 19th century the membership of the Montgomery Street Church was almost 50% black and included both free and slave. "On October 21, 1809, the trustees of the church received $41 for lots of $3 each to be laid out as a burying ground for the colored friends." These lots were probably paid for by blacks or by sponsorship and were, no doubt, in a specific section of the old grounds. The cemetery was used spasmodically during the next several years, as the few inscriptions for that period indicate. According to legend, the British, when they overran the capital in 1812, buried some of their (Hessian) mercenaries in the Methodist Grounds. Whether true or not, that rumor has persisted through the years until the present time.⁹

During the Revolutionary War the British were, in fact, aided by German Auxiliaries that numbered between fifteen and twenty thousand. These Hessians came from the little city of Cassel in North Germany.

The land of Hess-Cassel was poor, and the landgraves (counts having jurisdiction over a specific territory) had early in history profited by "selling out" men.¹⁰ The Hessians aided the British considerably from 1776 through 1781 in many important battles. They were involved in the southern campaign in 1780 and 1781, being stationed primarily at Charleston, South Carolina. The British maintained the Hessians in America until about 1783 when about seventeen thousand three hundred and thirteen German mercenaries returned safely to Europe. Many Hessian officers and privates received grants of land in Nova Scotia; others were left in Canada.¹¹

There is no indication that the British used mercenaries to aid their efforts during the purge of the Capital City, although within the advancing army (85th Light Infantry) was a detachment of one hundred Negroes armed with muskets, some with fixed bayonets.¹² When the populace of Washington rallied to help defend the city, the National Intelligencer paid its tribute to "those thousand of brave men" who it said prepared to "resist the host of mercenaries that now threaten us." The term "mercenaries" in this instance apparently referred to the British troops themselves. Defenders at the Battle of Bladensburg killed about 249 British. After the battle 200 British soldiers moved forward under a white flag into the helpless city. At Second Street, Northeast, a volley of fire killed one British soldier and wounded three others. As the advancing troops set fire to those buildings they considered to be the most important, they encountered no further serious resistance. Several other detachments followed and trod down Pennsylvania Avenue. "The city was silent. Those citizens who had not fled the capital either kept to their shuttered homes or were sleeping fitfully in huts and corn fields just outside the city"¹³ From all reports Georgetown was one of the safest places in the city to be at the time.

The rumor persists, though, that bodies of (Hessian) mercenaries were lying about the streets of Georgetown and that many were gathered up and buried in an unmarked grave in the old Methodist Cemetery. If a rumor, perhaps one basis for its beginnings might be the fact that as late as 1885 the name "Hessian" was sometimes heard as a term of reproach in country districts.¹⁴ The location of the burial is claimed to have been just inside the old gate and on the right, possibly in one of the cripts located in that area. This idea could not be supported by one of the mid-twentieth century caretakers of the grounds who stated that he had never heard nor had seen any indication of such a burial.¹⁵ One resident who lives in close proximity to the cemetery remembers that as late as 1967 there was a stone lying flat and engraved in German and that "it was just inside the old gate on the right just as it (the path) curved to the right."¹⁶ It might be speculated that the German burial was that of the Hessians so often reputed to be there.

In the years after the British assault the sense of pride of the blacks of Georgetown increased. In 1814, that pride prompted the black members to break off from the main body of the Montgomery Street Church and form a separate congregation of their own. On the road that led down to the mill on Rock Creek, now known as 27th Street, a short distance north of P Street, they erected a small building to be used as their meeting place. This society of colored Methodists remained under the supervision and control of the white church society as late as 1855. It became known as the Mt. Zion Episcopal Church.¹⁷

Burials continued within the church grounds, and a new section was opened in 1822 with lots selling for $15. The popularity of the grounds remained strong with the congregation for about the next 25 years. With the chartering of the neighboring Oak Hill Cemetery by Congress in 1849, however, the Methodist Grounds apparently suffered. There reportedly was "a disposition to sell this ground and apply the proceeds to other purposes, but this cannot be done. The best way is to turn it over to Mt. Zion Church, on condition that they keep up the fence and put the grounds in order."¹⁸ In 1877 the Mt. Zion Church applied for the use of the cemetery. A lease was drawn up on May 24, 1879, though not recorded until April 8, 1893. The lease gave Mt. Zion Church use of the burying ground for ninety-nine years. In return Mt. Zion agreed " . . . to make all needed improvements, fencing, roadways, walks, paths, planting of trees, and such other changes as may make the property suitable for their use and purposes, but shall respect and maintain all burial sites now occupied, all tombs, monuments and land marks as far as are known." The Dumbarton Church reserved the right to bury in the first four sections lying upon the southwest corner of the cemetery and the two sections lying upon the southeast corner, each being twenty-four (24) feet by ninety six (96) feet. Prior to this transfer of Custody, "disinterments were made," but there is no indication from what portion of the grounds this might have been accomplished.

Thus, the Mt. Zion Church, which some consider to have been founded on October 16, 1816, by 125 colored members, acquired custody of the Methodist Burying Ground in 1879. The Female Union Band Society, formed in 1842 for the burial of free blacks, had established their cemetery adjacent to and just to the west of the Methodist Grounds. Because of the Mt. Zion Church affiliation, and the fact that the two cemeteries had no visible dividing boundary between them, the two grounds were thought by District residents to be only one, and the term "Mt. Zion Cemetery" applied collectively. Because of the close-knit appearance of the cemeteries, any topographical picture of the Methodist area almost had to include some descriptive aspect of the Female Union Band side.

The cemeteries (collectively) occupy two lots in Squares 1288 and 1289 (See Appendix A) in the Georgetown Historic District. The Female Union Band Society Burying Ground (lot 802), lying to the west, is about 66,500 square feet; the old Methodist Episcopal burying Ground (lot 803), lying to the east, is about 67,300 square feet in area. The two cemeteries are divided almost equally on a north-south axis on a tract of land which is polygonal in shape and is approximately three acres in extent. Its location is on Mill Road off 27th Street, just north of the intersection of 27th and Q Streets, Northwest. The grounds are situated on a rise which overlooks Rock Creek Park. The area, a gently sloping plateau which is at its highest point approximately 85 feet above Rock Creek, falls sharply away on three sides, descending to the banks of the creek. Old Lyons Mill Road, which formerly provided access from Lyons Mill at Rock Creek, ascends the gently rising slope along the western boundary of the Female Union Band Grounds and continues until it becomes 27th Street at the southwest corner of the cemetery (Female Union Band side). Oak Hill Cemetery, founded in 1849, lies to the west of this road. Though now abandoned, the old roadbed continues to survive. "Mill Road, the original access road to the old Methodist Burying Ground, runs from the end of 27th Street approximately three quarters of the length of the southern boundary of the cemeteries." A parking area belonging to an apartment building on Q Street and two semi-detached houses and a two-story apartment building complex, dating from 1939-1940, at 2511 Q Street, lie to the southeast of the cemeteries. "The northern and most of the eastern boundaries of the grounds abut Rock Creek Park. Originally, the cemeteries were bounded on the north by the creek, but in 1929 an 18,850 square foot parcel of land on the south bank of the creek, now lot 801 in Squares 1288-1289, was condemned for use as parkland.²⁰

The Methodist Grounds had its most attractive appearance, as older residents can best remember, during the latter part of the 19th century and the beginning part of the 20th century. During those most prosperous years the cemetery was well-kept and it was a place of great community activity and dedicated involvement, especially on Memorial Day, when youths would sit near the entrance to the grounds on Mill Road and sell flowers, water and lemonade. A high wooden fence, complete with entry gate, ran the length of the south side as did a low brick wall. At the gate a dirt path divided in a "Y" fashion. The right fork first curved to the right and then divided several times so that visitors might have access to the many graves in the southeastern portion of the grounds. Also, a brick retaining vault, located on sloping terrain in the northeastern portion of the cemetery and said to have been used as a hiding place by the Underground Railroad, could be reached most conveniently by this route. The fork to the left broke slightly to the left, then continued in a northerly direction passing just behind the large Beck-Doughty monument which stands on the west-center of the site. Several branches of this path wormed throughout the area toward the north, eventually meeting with the extension of pathways from the vault side. During the early years the terrain had not eroded to the extent now visible, and the plateau area of the grounds continued north for many more feet, thus extending the level burial area. The bank then dropped in a fairly steep breakaway, but not too steep for burials which were conducted on the resulting hillside. At the bottom of the slope, on the northern end of the grounds, was a brick, retaining wall, probably added for anti-erosion purposes. No longer visible, the wall must have collapsed under the relentless weight of the damp soil, and most of the hillside burials, no doubt, slid down the embankment to the creek area to become reburied in the excavation process when Rock Creek Parkway was cut through.

Within the small grounds an extraordinarily large number of authorized and "bootleg" interments were conducted. There has never been total agreement as to the number of burials that have been made in the old Methodist Cemetery. The main reason is that, although graves are apparently laid out in rows, there are no plat books showing grave locations or names of those interred. The few records that do exist are vague and fragmentary and deal only with a few twentieth century burials.²¹ Another major problem is encountered when dealing with any official reference to the grounds. Often District records refer to the "Mt. Zion Cemetery" and make no distinction between the Methodist and Female Band side. The District of Columbia began to keep its first official register of deaths occurring in the District in a book which covers the period 1855-1874. Fortunately in that record book the cemetery was recognized as two separate grounds, and the meagre entries specify "Mt. Zion" and "Union" burials. Obviously, this record is far from accurate, for there are less than 20 burials indicated for the Mt. Zion side for that period. As the twentieth century progressed, the health department took a greater interest in burying grounds, and in the Report of the Health Officer of the District of Columbia, mention is made of interments in the grounds. During the years that report was made, 1880-1930, the two cemeteries were combined for reporting purposes. The number of burials for those years was 6,316 (reported) within the approximate three acre tract. (See Appendix D) That same report shows that the highest number of burials within the cemeteries were made in 1892, 1900, 1916, 1917 and 1918. The last three years indicated might relate to

World War I military burials, but there is no proof of this. There has also been speculation that there are Civil War Veterans buried there, although no official records support this theory.²² In fact the only military inscriptions of any kind found were the following:

"Cary Evans, Co. H. 59th U.S. CT"

"Franklin Jennings 1836-1926
Co. B 5th Mass. Calvary"

"CHF. ENGR. E. D. Robie USN"

Conflicting reports have put the total number of burials within the two cemetery areas anywhere from 500 to about 10,000.²³ Twentieth century cemetery authorities feel, however, that a more realistic view toward burials in any cemetery is from 1000 to 1,100 interments per acre of land available.²⁴ Using this as a guide and the fact that recent clean-up efforts have uncovered a total of about 310 monuments on the Methodist side, an acceptable estimate of the burials conducted there can be made. Also within such an estimate must be considered the many "bootleg burials" and interments which were conducted between grave sites.²⁵ Of the 310 monuments found, it can be conservatively assumed that an additional 25%, or more, were covered as the ground sank, lost, stolen or could not be identified. The total number of monuments that must have stood there at one time probably exceeded 400. Although still extremely high by modern-day standards, I feel that a fair estimate of burials made in the Methodist portion of the grounds is around 4000.

The earliest inscription located in the old Methodist Grounds is that of Margaret D. Beck, d. Jan. 29, 1804, aged 13 mo. & 21 da. From the time the grounds opened, until the 1870's, when the cemetery was officially turned over to the black congregation, the Dumbarton Church was responsible for burials there. The Dumbarton Church records relating to those burials no longer exist, and since so many gravemarkers have disappeared over the years, there is no way of ascertaining how many burials, black or white, were conducted during the Dumbarton period of supervision. Nevertheless, the markers that remain reflect much about the status of the various individuals and families that lie buried in the site.

The oldest and most massive stone on the Methodist side is that of the white Beck-Doughty family (previously mentioned), which stands near the highest point of the area, seemingly overlooking the many graves which followed its erection. The plot of the Eliason family, another early white family of the Episcopal faith, was located just inside the old entry gate and to the right. Also near that section were located several marble grave covers which sealed brick underground vaults. No doubt, the remains of many other white, unidentified families still rest within them. During the Dumbarton days the most expensive stones probably belonged to the white or more prosperous black members of the congregation. Slaves, in many instances, did not have markers at all or had simple wooden ones which have rotted with time. During the later years many of the black members used sandstone markers to identify graves. From this fast-wearing stone inscriptions faded quickly because of the effects of the weather. The lack of funds forced many people to create their own markers by the use of painted wooden plaques, piles of rocks, or flowers planted to mark the location.

The evidence of much sacrifice is seen, though, from studying pictures of the early grounds before abandonment and the overgrowth of weeds came about as the twentieth century moved on. There was an unusually large number of family plots for the size of the area. They were outlined by pipes inlaid into cement pillars (of varying height and shape) at the four corners. Many plots were also enclosed by wrought iron ornamental fencing, many complete with access gates. Throughout the cemetery were found, during a massive clean-up campaign in 1975, many legible stones which were of an expensive and lasting variety. These stones have, of course, been preserved.

The Mt. Zion Church maintained the cemetery from 1879 until about 1950 when, because of a lack of funds the cemetery fell into disuse and became overgrown and apparently abandoned. A recent court decision ordered that custody of the old cemetery be remanded to Dumbarton Methodist Church control.

Now, with Dumbarton's permission, the old Methodist Grounds have been cleared, except for the large Beck-

Doughty monument and several other smaller ones. The clearing process was accomplished through the efforts of both churches, aided by the Afro-American Bicentennial Corporation, members of the Metropolitan Police Department and student workers from Western High School in the District. The churches and the Afro-American organization, along with many concerned citizens, know that the history held within the old Methodist Grounds is much too valuable to give way to real estate speculators.

HISTORICAL PRESPECTIVE OF THE OLD METHODIST GROUNDS

RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE: The old Methodist Episcopal Burying Ground derives its most important significance from its being founded as the biracial burying ground of a biracial congregation during a period in American history when segregation prevailed. Slaves owned by some of the parishioners of the Dumbarton Street Church of early Georgetown are probably buried there, thereby creating a genealogical and historical association with evolving black culture in the District of Columbia. Also, many of the tombstones are of Civil War-time Georgetown inhabitants, black and white. The early Dumbarton congregation was significant in itself in that "the Dumbarton Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church is one of the oldest societies of that denomination of Christians in America. It also is the first established in the District of Columbia. For over a hundred years it has been a landmark of Methodism."²⁶

CEMETERIAL DISTINCTION: The old Methodist Burying Ground is the oldest truly biracial burying area remaining within the District of Columbia. In addition, it is the only cemetery of that distinction located in the Georgetown section of the city, and it is the only cemetery remaining in the District which was specifically maintained for the burial of slaves and former slaves.

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE: Many phases of District of Columbia history are reflected in the history of the old Methodist Burying Ground. Many individuals interred there were, no doubt, associated with the founding of the Montgomery Street Church, already noted as the District landmark of Methodism. The family of Ebenezer Eliason, for instance, who acted as purchasing agent for that church when the cemetery property was obtained in 1808, is buried there. Also, living in Georgetown today, though generations removed, are surviving relatives of some of the early Georgetown proprietors.

During the time that the Underground Railroad was active, the cemetery proved to be a safe hiding place. It is alleged that the old retaining vault there was used for this purpose as escaping slaves made their way to safety in the north. Georgetown, incidentally, was a major slaveowning district during that time.

In addition, one of the servants of Abraham Lincoln is reputed to be buried there, but this has not been substantiated.²⁷

INTERMENTS:

Following is an alphabetical list of interments in the old Methodist Burying Ground. This list is by no means complete, because few and meagre records of those burials are available. Also, many church members and citizens failed to respond to several requests for burial information they have. Much knowledge concerning these burials has been lost for years and will never be recovered. Therefore, many individuals and families believed to be interred there, may not be listed.

To conserve space certain symbols are used to identify such things as: the source of the entry; the grid letter and marker number (used to locate the burial on a plat map accompanying this report); and, other abbreviations.

SYMBOLS USED AND EXPLANATIONS

I = Indicates information obtained from the gravemarker. The name, dates, and other information, are reproduced as found inscribed.

DC = This indicates that the information given was obtained from the District of Columbia record of deaths covering 1855-1874.

MZ = This indicates that the information given was obtained from the Mt. Zion Church records. These records are in two books, covering the periods 1913 to 1940, and 1936 to 1942, respectively.

Q = This represents information obtained from a questionnaire distributed to Mt. Zion Church members, and to other congregations.

* = The asterisk indicates that the burial may be on either the old Methodist side or the Female Band side of the Mt. Zion Cemetery area. In several instances, the members contributing information did not know on which side deceased were interred.

AA

THROUGH = This double letter, or letter-
J9 number combination, refers to the grid layout of the wall map of the grounds. (See Appendix B or C) This will be followed by a number, arbitrarily assigned to the interment.

NUMBERS ASSIGNED

TO INTERMENTS Each known interment is assigned a number. These numbers range from 1 to 558 and are for identification purposes only. They do not indicate the order in which the original interments were made.

APPROXIMATION

OF INTERMENT

LOCATIONS In some instances, the location of an interment was plotted either from questionnaire data, or by consulting photographs. In this case, the number assigned the interment will be followed with an "A", indicating an approximation of the burial location,

ADDENDUM

In 1973, transcriptions were copied from the grave-stones in the Mt. Zion Cemetery grounds. At that time no distinction was made between the Old Methodist side and the Female Band side. Therefore, the resulting list, although helpful to this study, could not be used singularly as a catch-all when the Western High School students transcribed the Old Methodist side in 1975.

The 1973 list, although combined, was an important aid. It supplied names of those whose markers had either been lost or become illegible during the intervening two years. The 1973 list was first compared with the recent transcriptions from the Old Methodist side. Then, after seeing if names of known burials submitted by church members and others were on the list, the names on it were matched with gravestones remaining on the Female Band side of the cemetery. The resulting list below contains those burials which had gravemarkers in 1973, but are now not identified with a particular side of the burial ground.

For clarity, it is suggested that the planned study of the Female Band Society side of the cemetery be consulted.
